L.

L (el), the twelfth letter of the modern and the eleventh of the ancient Roman alphabet, represents historically the Gr. lambda and ultimately the Semitic lamed. The earliest known Semitic forms of the character are ℓ and ℓ; both these occur in early Greek inscriptions; the latter was adopted from the Greek into the Latin alphabet, and is the ancestor of the modern Roman forms, but in Greece itself was superseded by the inverted form λ, which eventually became Λ.

The sound normally expressed by the letter is the 'point-side' consonant, i.e. a sound produced by the emission of breath at the sides, or one side, of the oral passage when it is partially closed by contact or the 'point' of the tongue with the gums or palate.

In phonetic treatises l is used as a general name for consonants produced by lateral emission of breath, whether the stoppage is produced (as above) by the 'point', or by some other part of the tongue; thus we speak of a 'guttural l' and a 'palatal l' as occurring in various foreign languages.

The 'point-side' consonant admits of considerable diversity in mode of articulation and consequently in acoustic quality. The Eng. l differs from that of Fr. and Ger. in being uttered with the 'front' of the tongue more concave; hence its sound is 'duller' or 'thicker'. Its precise place of articulation varies according to the nature of the adjacent sounds. In Eng. it is normally voiced; an unvoiced l occurring only as a 'glide' connecting the voiced l with a preceding or following unvoiced consonant. Like r and the nasals, l may be used as a sonant or vowel (in the phonetic notation in this Dictionary indicated by l̥); but this occurs only in unstressed syllables, as in little (*l̥*itl̥), booklet (bʊk̥l̥).

The mod. Eng. l represents not only the OE. l, but the OE. hl (early ME. h) and wh. In certain combinations an original l has regularly become silent, after having modified the sound of the preceding vowel. In most of these cases the l is still written, and serves to indicate the pronunciation of the preceding vowel. The following combinations of letters (when occurring in the same syllable, or in derivatives of words in which they were autosegmental) may be regarded as compound phonetic symbols of almost unvarying value: alf (ʌf), alve (ʌv), alm (ʌm), alk, ank (ʌk), alim (ʌm), olk (ʌk). In many dialects, esp. in Sc., the instances in which an original l regularly disappears are much more numerous than in standard Eng.; cf. Sc. avul, fou, ca, etc.; in Sc. the regular representative of olk is ov, as in fouk, for.

[OE. hlāfdige sk. fem.; g. hlif bread, Loaf + root dīg to knead; see DOUGH.

Like the corresponding masc. designation hlāfōd, Loro, the word is not found outside Eng. (the Icel. lafr is adopted from ME.). The etym. above stated is not very plausible with regard to sense; but the attempts to explain hlāfdige as a deriv. of hlāfōd are unsatisfactory: the fem. suffix in OE. is -ige, not -ige, and the umlaut in the first syllable is difficult to explain on this supposition.

The OE. z being regularly shortened in ME. before two consonants, yielded regularly ā and æ according to dialect. The ME. hlāfdi (Leid), is represented by Sc. ladi. The other form hlāfdi (= leavedi) became leavedi (3 syllables), and by regular development leavedi; afterwards the e became silent and the r was dropped; hence the mod. Eng. form.

The genitive sing. (OE. hlāfdigan) became by regular phonetic change in ME. coincident in form with the nom.; and hence certain syntactical combs. have the appearance of proper compounds, as lady-bird, Lady-day, Lady-chapel.]

4. A woman of superior position in society, or to whom such a position is conventionally or by courtesy attributed. Originally, the word connoted a degree equal to that expressed by lord; but it was (like its synonyms in all European langs.) early widened in application, while the corresponding masc. term retained its restricted comprehension.

In mod. use lady is the recognized fem. analogue of gentleman, and is applied to all women above a loosely-defined and variable, but usually not very elevated standard of social position. Often used (esp. in 'this lady') as a more courteous synonym for 'woman', without reference to the status of the person spoken of. See also FINE LADY, YOUNG LADY.

As the traditional association of lady with lort still survives, the former is a title of ostensibly higher dignity than gentleman. Hence, and not directly as the result of the sentiment of gallantry, the customary order of words in 'ladies and gentlemen'.

6. As an honorific title.

a. A prefix forming part of the customary designation of a woman of rank. Also in My lady, an appellation used (chiefly by inferiors) in speaking to or of those who are designated by this prefix.

In the 15-16th c., The (or My) Lady was prefixed to the Christian name of a female member of the royal family, as 'Princess' is now. With regard to the use of the prefix in the titles of the nobility of the British Isles, usage has varied greatly at different times, but the following rules are now established: (1) In speaking of a marchioness, countess, viscountess, or baroness (whether she be such in her own right, by marriage, or by courtesy), the prefix Lady is a less formal substitute for the specific designation of rank, which is not used in conversational address: thus 'the Marchioness (of A.)' is spoken to, and informally spoken of, as 'Lady A.' (2) The daughters of dukes, marquises, and earls have Lady (more formally, e.g. on a superscription, The Lady) prefixed to their Christian names. (3) The wife of the holder of a courtesy title in which Lord is prefixed to a Christian name is known as 'The Lady John B.' (4) The wife of a baronet or other knight ('Sir John C.') is commonly spoken of as 'Lady C.', the strictly correct appellation 'Dame Mary C.' being confined to legal documents, sepulchral monuments, and the like.

Lady's here is in origin a shortening of Our Lady's, and became familiar through the 16th c. herbalists; in more recent times ladies' has in some cases been substituted, the change being perhaps assisted by the old spelling ladies of the possessive singular. The designation is usually given to plants of a more than usual beauty or delicacy. (Cf. G. Marien, frauen, and F. de notre Dame.)

|| Lag (lag), sb.1 and a. [Belongs to LAG v.2; the origin and mutual relation of the words are obscure.

In some parts of England sof, seg, lag, or foggie, seggie, laggie, are used in children's games as substitutes for 'first, second, last' (see Eng. Dial. Dict. s.v. Fog). This suggests the possibility that lag may have originated in the language of sports as an arbitrary distortion of last; but even in that case the word may have coalesced with a homophone of independent origin. The current hypothesis that the adj. is a Welsh lag (earlier lloch), Ir. and Gael. lag, slack, weak, is highly improbable. There is some affinity of sense between lag and LACK a. and v. (cf. to come lag and to come lack); the former might conceivably be an alteration of the latter under the influence of words like FLAG v.1, LAG sb.2. Cf. further MDa. lakke to go slowly (Kalkaf).

-laik, suffix, in the Ormulum written -le33c, in northern and north-midland texts usually -laik, -layk(e, in the Ancræn Riwle (MS. Nero) and a few other 13th c. texts -leic, -lec, -leik; appended in ME. to adjs. to form sbs. of quality, none of which have survived into mod. Eng. Etymologically it represents the ON. -leik-r str. masc. which (with a parallel form -leike wk. masc.) is the ordinary suffix in ON. corresponding functionally to the Eng. -ness; its use in Eng. must have originated in words adopted from Scandinavian, as godle33c (Orm.) from ON. gðleikr; but already in the Ormulum (c 1200) it is added freely to native English adjs., as in clænle33c cleanness, gredile33c greediness. Ormin has in all 28 words of this formation; in some instances he originally wrote -nesse, but -le33c has been substituted 'in a ruder but apparently contemporary hand' (editorial note in Ormn. II. 349); the reason was perh. metrical, as -le33c and -nesse were in Ormin's prosody equivalent only before a vowel. Except in the Ormulum the suffix is somewhat rare, and no instance is known of its being appended to an adj. of Romanic origin.

The ON. -leik-r corresponds in form with the OE. suffix -lāc (usually neut., rarely masc.), now -lock (q.v. for the etymology); but in function the two are distinct, the ON. suffix being appended only to adjs., and the OE. suffix only to sbs. or verbi-forms representing OE. -lāc was in northern or north-midland texts written -laik, so that it became coincident in form with the Scandinavian suffix, e.g. in dwinerlaik (Alex.), wedlaik (R. Brunne).

F. lampas (in 16th c. also lampast), in 12-15th c. gen., a disease producing intense thirst (e.g. attributed to 'Dives' in bell), later only a disease of horses.

The origin is obscure. The primary sense may be 'inside of the mouth'; this is not proved by the existence of the phrase inimicet le lampas 'to wet one's whistle', but cf. lampasé (Her. 'langued' (see LAMPASSING); some Fr. dialect glossaries, also, have the word with the sense 'uvula'. Florio has lan lampas as the name of the disease, and Littré cites a Fr. dial. form emphas, which is due to mistake of the initial l for the article.

Lampas (læmpās), sb. Also 4 lawmpas, 6 lampors. [The combination lampas douck (Du. dock cloth) in the second quot. suggests that the word may be adopted from Du.; the recorded form in MDn. and early mod. Du. is lampers (cf. the Eng. form lampors); mod. Du. has lamfer (the MDn. lamfeter, denoting some appurtenance of a hawk, is identified with this by Verwijs and Verdam, but with doubtful correctness). The etymology is quite obscure; derivation from Gr. lampōs, shining, was suggested in the 16th c. In sense 2 the Eng. word is a. F. lampas, recorded only from the 18th c., and possibly a different word.]

G. lamprete, whence Sw., Da. lampret), MDn. lampreide. The ulterior etymology is uncertain.

The med. L. lampreda is usually believed to be an alteration of the synonymous lampetra (recorded earlier, viz. in the Glossary of Philoxenus, 14-5th c.), which is explained as f. l. lanbēre to lick + petra stone, in allusion to the fact that the lamprey attaches itself by a sucker to stones. The use of med. L. lampreda for the LIMPET as well as the lamprey gives some plausibility to this; but possibly lampetra may be merely an etymologizing perversion.

Larboard (lār-bōrd, -bōrd), sb. (a.) Naut.

Forms: a. 4 ladde-borde, 5 ladeborde, lath-borde, latebord. b. 6 larborde, lerbord, leerebord, 6-7 larbo(o)rd, 7 lubbord, 7- larboard. [ME. laddeborde, lathborde, altered in the 16th c. into ler, leere, larbord, by form-association with the contemporary ster, steere, starbord. The second component is OE. bord, ON. borde, ship's side (BOARD sb. 12); the origin of the first component, which appears as ladde, lade, lathe, late, has not been determined.

Some would connect it with LAD v., taking it to mean 'the side on which cargo was received', or on which deck cargo was placed.

In OE, the corresponding term was lærbord; this did not survive into ME., though its etymological equivalent still remains in all the mod. continental Teut. tongues, and was adopted into Rom. (F. lâbord). The word seems to have meant 'the side at the back of the steersman'; the rudder or steering-paddle of early Germanic ships having been worked over the right side, whence the name stiorbord 'steering-side', STARBOARD.]

The side of a ship which is to the left hand of a person looking from the stern towards the bows. Opposed to starboard. (Freq. in phr. without the article, as †on, †by, †a, to larboard.)

The term has now been discarded in the navy and supplanted by port, to avoid confusion with the similar-sounding starboard.

a. Of material objects. Also in phrases like large of limb = 'having large limbs'.

Lark (lā'k), v. collog. (orig. slang.) [Belongs to LARK sb.; the sb. and vb. appear first in 1811-3. The origin is somewhat uncertain.

Possibly it may represent the northern LAKE v., as heard by sporting men from Yorkshire jockeys or groomers; the sound (læk, læ'k), which is written lark in Robinson's Whitby Glossary and in dialect books, would to a southern hearer more naturally suggest 'lark' than 'lake' as its equivalent in educated pronunciation. On the other hand, it is quite as likely that the word may have originated in some allusion to LARK sb.; cf. the similar use of skylark vb. (which, however, is app. not recorded till much later).]

Larrikin (lär'ikin). Chiefly Austral. Also larikin. [Of uncertain origin; possibly f. Larry (a nickname for Lawrence, common in Ireland) + -KIN.]

The word seems to have originated in Melbourne not long before 1870; but the current story that it was evolved by a reporter from an Irish policeman's pronunciation of larking, heard in a Melbourne police-court in 1869, appears to be a figment, no trace of the incident being found in the local papers of the time. (See MORRIS, Austral Eng., s. v.) A guess that has been proposed is that it is short for Eng. slang larry kichen.

identity of the word is doubtful. To leave in the lash = to leave in the lurch. To lie in the lash:

sense 'a lead or string in which an animal is held, a snare' phrases a sense 'mire'.

[Of difficult etymology. The quots. seem to show that in branch I. the vb. is the source, not the derivaparallel and nearly synonymous LUSH v.; cf. dash, dush, flash, flush, mash, mush, smash, smush, etc.

The ME. lappes, from which the modern standard Eng. form descends, prob. represents an OE. læpp*, as this would correspond to the synonymous OHG. lat(t)a, ladda (MHG., mod. G. latte); but the mutual relation of the two types is obscure, and the occurrence of a geminated p in OE. læpp has no known parallel or explanation. Some scholars think that the substitution of p for t was due to the influence of the synonymous (and perh. cognate) Welsh lath = Irish slat:—OCeltic slatla*. The Teut. word has passed into the Rom. langs. (cf. It. latta, Sp. lata, F. latte); it is usu. regarded as cogn. w. MHG. lade plank (mod. G. laden counter, shop.)]

Lath, obs. form of LOATH.

Lathe (læð), sb. [late OE. læð sir. neut., corresponding to ON. læð (poet.) landed possession, land:—OE. læþm*; according to some scholars cogn. w. læð in Goth. un-læls poor (? lit. without landed possessions), OE. un-læðe wretched.

The form lathe (recorded from 14th c.) would, if it represented a pronunciation handed down by oral tradition, imply that the OE. word had a short vowel, and connexion with lathan, to summon, would then be possible. Probably, however, the word had little oral currency, so that its form may have been influenced by the spelling of early documents. The identity of the word with ON. læð (which involves the conclusion that the OE. form was læð) is rendered almost certain by the following facts. (1) The OE. word is in one instance recorded in the sense of the ON. word, viz., in the legal formula 'ne ȝyrie ic þines ne lathes ne landes ne sace ne socne' (Schmid, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, app. xi), where it has the same alliterative association as in the frequent ON. phrase 'land ok lath'. (2) This alliterative association recurs in our first quotation, where the word has its specific Kentish application. (3) Our second quotation implies that 'the lathe of Aylesford' was the territory that was under a jurisdiction attached to the manor of Aylesford, so that the development of the special Kentish use from the general sense of 'landed possession' presents no difficulty.

The possibility is not excluded that the Kentish term may represent a coalescence of the original OE. læð, territory, with other words of similar form: cf. ON. leif fem. a court or judicial assembly, and OE. læð or læde in midlæðu pl. attendances at a 'moot' or assembly (? related to ON. læða, OE. lðan, to go); also mod. Da. læg 'division of a parish for military purposes' (f. root of LIE, LAY &c.).

The latinized leidegreve (see b) may, as is commonly assumed, represent an OE. læðgerfan* 'lathe-reeves'; but the text is of little authority.

Lathe (læð), sb. Also 5, 7 lath. [Of obscure history; prob. cognate with Da. lad, in drejelad turning-lathe, also in other compounds in which it has the general sense of 'stand, supporting framework', e.g. savelad saw-bench, sengelad bedstead, lathelad gantry, wævelad loom. The Da. word is prob. a special use of lad pile, heap regularly built up:—ON. hlæð, related to hlæða to LADE.

If the coincidence in form and meaning with Da lad be not purely accidental, the Eng. word must, notwithstanding its late occurrence, have come down from the time of the Danish settlements in England. (A native OE. cognate is out of the question, as it would have had d, not ð.) The Da word, in compounds, is cited by Kalkar from the 15-16th c. As the older form of turning-lathe, used as late as the 19th century, was worked by means of a spring-lath overhead (see drawing in Encycl. Brit. ed. 9, XIV. 323), it is not wholly impossible that the word may be a modification of LATH sb.; but against this is the occurrence of the word in the wider Danish sense (see sense 1).

The ON. lað (in Dicts. miswritten læð, and explained 'smith's lathe') is commonly given as the etymon, but erroneously. All that is known of the word is that it was used in composition to form poetic synonyms for gold.

By a natural development the terms afterwards came (in late Latin, app. not yet in Greek) to denote the distance of any place, in the breadthwise and lengthwise direction respectively, from the circle assumed as the origin of measurement.]

5. Astron. The angular distance of a heavenly body from the ecliptic: called spec. celestial latitude. (See also ASCENDING vbl. sb., GEOCENTRIC a. 1, HELIOCENTRIC a. 1, HELIOGRAPHIC a. 1.)

The history of this sense appears to be as follows. Orig. the word was applied, on the analogy of the geographical use (see 4) to denote the angular distance of a point in the celestial sphere from the equator, measured along a secondary to the latter. This, however, was not accurately distinguished by name from the distance of a point from the ecliptic, the terms 'latitude' and 'declination' being employed indiscriminately with reference to both these ways of indicating position. (Cf. quot. 1391.) In mod. use, the terms have been differentiated, declination being appropriated to what was originally and with historical propriety called 'latitude', while latitude became the name for distance from the ecliptic.

Laurence², Lawrence (lɔˈrɛns). [ad. L. Laurentius.] A Christian name, used to denote a personification of indolence. Laurence bids wages: a proverbial phrase meaning that the attractions of idleness are tempting. Also Lazy Laurence, a reproachful designation for an idle person.

Possibly the alliteration of the last-quoted phrase may sufficiently account for the use of the name; some, however, have suggested an allusion to the heat prevalent about St. Laurence's day (Aug. 10). Another conjecture is that there was a joke to the effect that when the martyr St. Laurence told his tormentors to turn him round on his gridiron, it was because he was too lazy to turn himself. It is important to note that the equivalent G. der faule Lenz (Lenz=Lorenz) has been in use from the 16th c.; see GRIMM s.v. Lenz.

1796 FROUDE Anonymous, (1809) 348 Laurence bids wages; a proverbial saying for to be lazy, because St. Laurence's day is the 10th of August, within the dog-days, and when the weather is usually very hot and faint. 1821 CLARE *Pill. Lave (læv), v. 1 Now chiefly poet. Forms: 1 lafan, 2 lafan, 2-3 lafin, 7 Sc. lawe, 4- lave.

[Two distinct formations appear to have coalesced—

(1) OE. had lafan to wash by affusion, to pour (water), corresponding formally to MDu., Du. laven, OHG. labōn (MHG., mod.G. laben) to refresh; cf. OHG. laba, mod.G. labe refreshment. By some scholars the OE., Du., and Ger. words are considered to represent a WGer. adoption of L. lavare to wash. This view involves some difficulty, as the numerous OHG. examples refer to refreshment by food, drink, or warmth, so that the assumed primary sense 'to wash', if it ever existed, must have been quite forgotten. The L. origin, however, accounts well for the senses of the OE. word, which perh. may be only accidentally similar in form to the continental words. (2) In ME. the representative of the OE. vb. blended indistinguishably with the vb. a. F. laver (= Pr., Sp., Pg. lavar, It. lavare):—L. lavare = Gr. louēiv, f. OArayan root *lou- to wash (whence LATHER).]

[Late OE. (c 1000) lagu str. fem. (pl. lagu -), a prehistoric ON. lagu* (= -Ocel. lge), pl. of lag neut.; in sing. the word meant in OE. 'something laid or fixed' (specific senses being, e.g. 'layer, stratum', 'share in an undertaking', 'partnership', 'fixed or market price', 'set tune', etc.); the pl. had the collective sense 'law', and in ON. it form became (as in OE.) a fem. sing.; cf. OSw. lagh neut. sing. and pl., law, Sw. lag, pl. lagar, Da. lov. The ON. lag corresponds to OS. lagu neut. (in the compounds aldar-lagu pl. destined length of life, or-lag fate, war); -O^{te} lagom, f. root lag* -; -O^{te} lagh -; lagh* -; see LAY, LIE vb. The Lat. leg-, lex is not now generally believed to be cognate (being referred to the root leg-* of legere to gather, read, λέγειν to gather, say); but in many other langs. the word for 'law' is derived from roots meaning 'to place'; cf., e.g. Eng. DOOR, Gr. θεύς, θεός, L. statutum, G. gesetz. The native word in OE. was æ: see Æ. As law is the usual Eng. rendering of L. lex, and to some extent of L. jus, and of Gr. νόμος, its development of senses has been in some degree affected by the uses of these words.]

[As the word was in Scandinavian a plural, though adopted in OE. as a sing., this collective sense is etymologically prior to that of 'specific enactment' (sense 2).]

(b) Physics.

Avogadro's law, the law that equal volumes of different gases, pressure and temperature being equal, contain the same number of molecules. Boyle's law, the principle, published by Robert Boyle about 1662, that the volume of a given mass of gas (the temperature being constant) varies inversely as the pressure. Charles's law, the law discovered by Alex. César Charles (1746-1823) that for every degree centigrade of rise in temperature, the volume of a gas increases by 1/273 of its amount at zero. Dulong and Petit's law, the law that all the chemical elements have approximately the same atomic heat.

1866 MAXWELL Sci. Papers (1890) I. 389 Boyle and Mariotte's law. 1863 ATKINSON Gaioli's Physics 110 The laws of the compressibility of gases were studied separately by Boyle and by Mariotti. Each of these philosophers arrived at the same law, which in England bears the name of Boyle's, and on the continent of Mariotti's. Ibid. 288 Dulong and Petit's law may be thus expressed; the same quantity of heat is needed to heat an atom of all simple bodies to the same extent. 1880 CLEMINSHAW tr. Wurtz's Atomic Theory v. 95 The 'law', as it is generally called, of Avogadro and Ampère may be enunciated as follows: Equal volumes of gases or vapours contain the same number of molecules. 1884 DANIELL Princ. Physics 223 Then the volume varies as the 'absolute temperature' (Charles's Law, often attributed to Gay Lussac).

(c) Philology.

Grimm's law, the rule formulated by Jacob Grimm (in the 2nd ed. of his Deutsche Grammatik, 1822) with regard to the representation in the Germanic langs. of certain consonants of the primitive Aryan language. Grimm's statement was that original aspirates became media in Gothic, Low German, English, Old Norse, etc. and tenues in High German; original media became tenues in Gothic, etc., and 'aspirates' (supposed to be represented by spirants and affricates) in High German; and original tenues became 'aspirates' in Gothic, etc. and media in High German. The formula is no longer accepted as correct, but the name of 'Grimm's law' is still applied to its rectified form, which is too complicated to be stated here. Verner's law, discovered by Karl Verner of Copenhagen in 1875, deals with a class of exceptions to Grimm's law, and is to the effect that an original Germanic voiceless spirant, when following or terminating a primitively unaccented syllable, became a voiced spirant, which in the historic Germanic langs. is under certain conditions represented by a media; the z which according to the 'law' results from s, except in Gothic, normally represented by r. Grassmann's law, published by Hermann Grassmann in 1863, is that when primitive Aryan had two aspirates in the same or successive syllables the former of them was in Sanskrit changed into the corresponding media, and in Greek into the corresponding tenuis.

(d) Pol. Econ.

Gresham's law, the principle, involved in Sir Thomas Gresham's letter to Q. Elizabeth in 1558, that 'bad money drives out good', i.e. that when debased money (sc. coins reduced in weight or fineness, or both) is current in the same country with coins of full legal weight and fineness, the latter will tend to be exported, leaving the inferior money as the only circulating medium.

1858 MACLEOD Econ. Pol. Econ. 477 As he was the first to perceive that a bad and debased currency is the cause of the disappearance of the good money, we are only doing what is just, in calling this great fundamental law of the currency by his name. We may call it Gresham's law of the currency.
